中考英语完形填空：最后一名的掌声

完形填空原文

Our school held a 1,500-meter race every year. I was never a good runner. I was short and got tired easily. But our teacher said everyone had to take part. "It's not about winning," she said. "It's about 1 the race."

On the day of the race, I stood at the starting line with fifty other students. The whistle blew. Everyone rushed forward. I ran as fast as I could, but I was soon left 2. By the second lap, most runners were far ahead. I was breathing hard. My legs felt heavy. I wanted to 3, but I kept going.

When I entered the third lap, I noticed something. The students who had already finished were standing along the track. They weren't laughing. They were 4. "Come on! You can do it!" someone shouted. More voices joined in. "Keep going!" "Almost there!"

Their cheers gave me strength. I 5 my pace. Step by step, I moved forward. My body was tired, but my heart felt lighter.

Finally, I crossed the finish line. I was last. Dead last. But the moment I crossed, something unexpected happened. The crowd — students, teachers, even the principal — started to clap. The applause was 6 than for the first-place winner. People were smiling at me. Someone patted my shoulder. "Well done," a teacher said. "You didn't give up. That's what matters."

I was confused at first. I had lost. Why were they cheering? Then I understood. They weren't cheering for my 7. They were cheering for my effort. For not giving up when every step was painful. For finishing what I had started.

That day changed how I saw competition. Winning isn't everything. Sometimes, the 8 respect goes to those who try their best, even when they know they might not win. The last runner who crosses the line with determination can inspire others as much as the first one who breaks the 9.

I still don't enjoy running. But I run anyway. Because I remember that afternoon — the cheers, the applause, and the lesson I learned: it's not about being first. It's about 10 your best and never stopping until you reach the end.
