中考英语完形填空：消失的蜂巢

完形填空原文

Last spring, a beehive appeared in the old oak tree behind our school. At first, some students were 1 and wanted it removed. But our biology teacher, Ms. Lin, said we should leave it alone.

"Bees are important," she explained. "They help plants grow by carrying pollen from flower to flower. Without bees, many of the 2 we eat every day would disappear."

Ms. Lin made the beehive part of our science class. We observed the bees from a safe distance, recording their behavior in notebooks. I was amazed at how 3 they worked — flying back and forth, never stopping, each bee knowing exactly what to do.

One morning in May, a student ran into the classroom shouting, "The bees are 4!" We rushed outside and saw that the beehive was empty. Not a single bee remained.

Ms. Lin looked worried. She explained that bees were disappearing all over the world. "Scientists call it Colony Collapse Disorder," she said. "Nobody knows exactly 5 it happens, but pollution, pesticides, and loss of flowers are all possible reasons."

We felt sad. The oak tree looked 6 without the busy little bees flying around it.

"Can we do anything to help?" I asked.

Ms. Lin smiled. "Actually, yes. We can plant bee-friendly flowers in our school garden. Bees need flowers for 7, and if we give them a reason to come back, maybe they will."

Our class spent the next two weeks planting lavender, sunflowers, and wildflowers around the school. We also put up a small sign: "Bee Garden — Please Don't Pick the Flowers."

By early June, we started hearing a familiar buzzing sound. A few bees appeared among the flowers, then more and more. They didn't return to the old hive, but they built a 8 one in a tree nearby.

We cheered. It was a small victory, but it 9 us something big: even small actions can make a real difference when we work together to 10 the natural world.
