中考英语完形填空：校门口的早餐摊

完形填空原文

Every morning, a small breakfast cart stood right outside our school gate. The owner was a middle-aged woman everyone called Aunt Fang. She sold steamed buns, soy milk, and egg pancakes. Her food was 1 but delicious.

Most students grabbed breakfast from her before the morning bell. Aunt Fang knew almost every student by 2. "The usual?" she would ask with a big smile, and before you could answer, your favorite food was already in her hands.

I had been buying breakfast from Aunt Fang since seventh grade. Over the years, I noticed something 3: she always gave extra food to a thin boy named Xiao Wei. His egg pancake was always bigger, and she would quietly slip an extra bun into his bag.

One day, I asked her about it. "Xiao Wei's family doesn't have much 4," she said softly. "His mom works two jobs, and he often comes to school without eating. I can't let a child go hungry."

"But doesn't that mean you 5 money?" I asked.

Aunt Fang laughed. "A little. But one extra bun won't make me poor. And seeing that boy eat a full breakfast makes me 6 than any money could."

This winter, something happened that showed how much Aunt Fang meant to all of us. She got sick and couldn't come for a whole week. The spot outside the school gate was 7. Students looked lost — not just because they missed the food, but because they missed her warm smile and cheerful voice.

When Aunt Fang finally came back, something 8 was waiting for her. The students had collected money and bought her a thick winter coat and a new pair of gloves. A card was attached: "Dear Aunt Fang, thank you for feeding us every morning. Please stay 9 and warm."

Aunt Fang read the card and tears ran down her face. "You kids," she whispered, shaking her head. But she was smiling.

That morning, I realized that kindness is like her soy milk — warm, simple, and it goes both 10.
