中考英语完形填空：破旧的篮球架

完形填空原文

Behind our apartment building, there was an old basketball hoop. The net was torn, the backboard was cracked, and the pole leaned to one side. Nobody played there except me and my neighbor, Da Ming. To us, that broken hoop was our 1.

Every evening after homework, we would meet at the hoop and shoot baskets until it got dark. Da Ming was much 2 at basketball than me — he could make shots from far away while I could barely score from right under the basket. But he never made fun of me.

"You'll get better," he always said. "You just need more 3."

One spring, the apartment management decided to tear down the old hoop and build a parking space. A notice was put up: the hoop would be 4 in two weeks.

Da Ming and I were heartbroken. "We have to do something," I said.

We wrote a letter to the management office, explaining how much the hoop 5 to the kids in the building. We collected signatures from other young residents. Twenty-three kids signed the letter.

The manager, Mr. Huang, read our letter. He was 6 by how many children cared. "I didn't know so many kids used that old thing," he said.

After some discussion, Mr. Huang made a 7: instead of removing the hoop, the management would repair it and even add a small concrete court around it. "Every community needs a place for children to 8," he said.

A month later, the new court was ready. The hoop had a fresh net, the backboard was replaced, and the ground was smooth and flat. Kids from the whole building came out to play.

That evening, Da Ming and I stood on the new court, looking at the shiny hoop. "We 9 it," he said, grinning.

I smiled back. We learned that if something matters to you, it's worth 10 for — even if it's just an old basketball hoop.
