05-05 第2篇

中考英语完形填空：图书馆里的陌生人

完形填空原文

I used to go to the city library every Saturday. It was my favorite place — quiet, cool, and full of 1. I would pick a corner seat, open a book, and lose myself for hours.

One Saturday, I noticed an old man sitting across from me. He wore a faded brown jacket and reading glasses that kept 2 down his nose. On the table in front of him were three thick books and a small notebook.

I saw him there again the next week, and the week after that. He was always in the same seat, always reading, always 3. I became curious about him but was too shy to say anything.

One afternoon, I accidentally knocked my water bottle off the table. It rolled across the floor and stopped right at his feet. He 4 it up and walked over to return it. "Here you go," he said with a warm smile. "Be careful with water near books."

"Thank you," I said. Then, without thinking, I asked, "What are you reading?"

His eyes 5 up. "I'm studying Chinese history," he said. "I'm writing a book about it."

"A book?" I was 6. "Are you a writer?"

"Not yet," he laughed. "I'm a retired bus driver. I only started reading seriously five years ago, after I stopped working. Now I'm trying to write the book I always wanted to read."

I was amazed. A seventy-year-old man, teaching himself history and writing a book. "Isn't it 7 to start something so big at your age?" I asked carefully.

He shook his head. "It's never too late to learn," he said. "The only thing that's too late is never 8 at all."

After that day, we became friends. Every Saturday, we would chat for a few minutes before returning to our books. He told me about ancient dynasties, and I told him about school. He 9 me to read more widely and to never stop being curious.

Last month, he gave me a printed copy of his first chapter. It was rough in places, but it was real. A retired bus driver had written something truly 10. And he proved that as long as you have the will, age is just a number.
