中考英语完形填空：消失的蝴蝶

完形填空原文

When I was little, the field behind our house was full of butterflies in spring. They came in every color — orange, yellow, white, and the most beautiful ones were deep 1. My sister and I would chase them for hours, laughing and tumbling through the tall grass.

But as the years passed, the butterflies became fewer and fewer. New buildings went up around the field. The grass was 2 to make way for a parking lot. By the time I reached eighth grade, the field was gone, and so were the butterflies.

I didn't think much about it until our biology teacher, Mr. Jiang, showed us a documentary about insect 3 around the world. Millions of species were disappearing because of pollution, habitat loss, and climate change. I was shocked to learn that butterflies were among the most 4 affected.

Mr. Jiang challenged us to do something about it. "You're young," he said. "But that doesn't mean you're 5. Even small actions can make a big difference."

Our class decided to create a butterfly garden on a small patch of unused land next to the school. We 6 native flowers that butterflies loved — lavender, daisies, and milkweed. We also built a small water station and put up signs asking people not to use pesticides nearby.

The first few weeks were 7. Nothing seemed to happen. A few bees came, but no butterflies. Some students lost interest. "Maybe they're not coming back," said Li Ming.

But we kept watering and weeding. Then, one warm morning in late April, I saw it — a single orange butterfly landing on a lavender bush. I held my 8, afraid to scare it away. Within a week, more followed. By May, our little garden was alive with color and movement.

The butterfly garden became the most popular spot in our school. Students came to read, draw, and simply 9 the beauty of nature. Even teachers brought their classes for outdoor lessons.

That experience changed the way I see the world. We may not be able to 10 every problem, but we can start with what's right in front of us. Sometimes, all it takes is a garden.
