中考英语完形填空：搬家那天

完形填空原文

The moving truck arrived at seven in the morning. My parents had been packing for weeks, but I had refused to 1. Putting things into boxes meant admitting that we were really leaving.

I had lived in this apartment since I was born. Every scratch on the wall, every stain on the carpet had a 2 behind it. The mark near the door was from the time I tried to ride my bicycle indoors. The crayon drawings on my bedroom wall were from when I was five.

"We need to go, Xiao Yu," my father said gently. "The new city will be 3 too, I promise."

I didn't answer. I walked through the empty rooms one last time. Without furniture, they looked much 4 than I remembered. The echoes of my footsteps bounced off the bare walls.

In my room, I found something under the windowsill — a small plastic dinosaur. It was the toy I had 5 everywhere when I was little. I thought I had lost it years ago. I put it in my pocket.

Downstairs, my best friend, Zhou Hao, was waiting by the truck. He handed me a small 6 wrapped in newspaper. "Open it later," he said, looking at the ground. His voice was shaking.

We hugged without speaking. I got into the car and looked back as we drove away. Zhou Hao stood on the sidewalk, waving until we turned the 7. Then he was gone.

The drive to the new city took six hours. I spent most of it staring out the window, watching the 8 scenery change from city to countryside to city again. My mother tried to start conversations, but I gave only short answers.

When we finally arrived at the new apartment, I went to my room and sat on the bare floor. I opened Zhou Hao's gift. Inside was a photo album — pictures of us from first grade to ninth grade. On the last page, he had written: "New places, same 9. Call me anytime."

I smiled for the first time that day. Home might be a new address now, but 10 like Zhou Hao — that was something no move could take away.
