中考英语完形填空：传纸条的男孩

完形填空原文

There was a boy in our class named Wei Dong who never spoke. He sat in the back row, kept his head down, and avoided eye 1 with everyone. Most students ignored him. Some even made fun of his silence.

One day, during a math test, a small folded note landed on my desk. I opened it carefully. In neat handwriting, it said: "The answer to Question 7 is wrong. You wrote 35, but it should be 53. Check 2."

I looked around. Wei Dong was staring at his own paper, pretending nothing had happened. I looked at Question 7 and realized he was 3. I had made a careless mistake.

After the test, I walked over to his desk. "Thanks for the note," I said quietly.

He looked up, clearly 4. He nodded quickly and looked back down.

Over the next few weeks, I started sitting closer to him. At first, he was uncomfortable with my 5. But gradually, he began to open up — through notes. He would write me short messages during class: a math tip, a joke he found funny, or a comment about the teacher's tie.

His notes were always thoughtful and often 6. I started writing back. Soon, we were having whole conversations on paper. It was like having a pen pal who sat two meters away.

One day, I asked him in a note: "Why don't you talk?"

His reply came slowly: "I have a stutter. When I try to speak, words get 7 in my throat. Kids used to laugh. So I stopped trying."

My heart 8. I had never thought about how hard it must be to want to say something but not be able to. I wrote back: "You don't need to speak for people to hear you. Your notes say more than most people's words."

He smiled — a real, wide smile. It was the first time I had seen him smile all year.

By the end of the semester, Wei Dong had made several friends, all through his notes. He even 9 a short letter at the class meeting, which the teacher read aloud. The whole class clapped.

I learned something important that year: communication isn't just about talking. Sometimes, the 10 voices have the loudest things to say.
