中考英语完形填空：教室后面的植物

完形填空原文

At the beginning of eighth grade, our biology teacher, Ms. Lin, placed a small potted plant on the shelf at the back of the classroom. "This is your class plant," she announced. "It's your 1 to keep it alive for the whole year."

Nobody took it seriously at first. It was just a tiny green plant in a plastic pot — nothing 2. But Ms. Lin had rules. Every Monday, one student was assigned to water it. Every Friday, someone had to check if it needed more sunlight.

The first few weeks went smoothly. But then, during exam season, everyone 3 about the plant. When I finally looked at it in late October, its leaves had turned yellow and were starting to fall off. It looked like it was dying.

Ms. Lin didn't say a word. She just 4 at the plant and then at us. Her silence was louder than any lecture.

I felt guilty. I had been the one assigned to water it that week, but I had been too 5 studying for exams to remember. That afternoon, I stayed after class, watered the plant, moved it closer to the window, and removed the dead leaves.

Over the next few days, others started helping too. Someone brought fertilizer from home. Another classmate made a watering 6 and posted it on the wall. A few students even started talking to the plant, encouraging it like a sick friend.

Slowly, the plant recovered. New green leaves appeared, and by December, it had even grown a small 7. The whole class cheered when they saw it.

"Do you understand now?" Ms. Lin asked us one day. "This plant is just like anything else in life. If you 8 it, it suffers. If you give it attention and care, it thrives."

She paused and looked around the room. "Friendships, health, studies — they all need 9 watering. You can't just remember them when they're dying."

That little plant taught me more than any textbook. By the end of the year, it had grown so tall that we had to move it to a bigger pot. And our class had grown too — not in size, but in the way we cared for each other.

On the last day of school, Ms. Lin asked, "Who wants to take the plant home for summer?"

Every 10 in the room went up.
