中考英语完形填空：校医院的护士

完形填空原文

I had always been nervous about the school hospital. The white walls and the smell of medicine made me 1. But last semester, I sprained my ankle during PE class and had to go there.

Nurse Wang met me at the door. She had a warm smile and gentle eyes. "Don't worry," she said. "Let me take a 2 at it." Her calm voice made me feel safer.

She helped me sit down and examined my ankle carefully. While she was wrapping it with a bandage, she asked about my grade and favorite subjects. The 3 made me forget the pain a little. She wasn't just treating my injury — she was treating me as a person.

"I see a lot of students here," Nurse Wang said. "Some come with colds, some with stomachaches. But do you know what many of them really need? Someone to 4. They're stressed about exams, worried about friends, or feeling lonely. I try to listen."

Her words stayed with me. I had never thought of the school hospital as a place for emotional support. But Nurse Wang had turned it into a 5 — a place where students could feel heard.

Over the next few weeks, I had to visit the hospital several times to change the bandage. Each time, Nurse Wang remembered my name and asked how I was doing. She even noticed when I looked sad one day. "Everything okay?" she asked. I wasn't used to adults 6 me like that. Most teachers only asked about grades.

I told her about the pressure I felt — the fear of disappointing my parents, the competition with my classmates. She listened without judging. "It's okay to feel overwhelmed," she said. "But remember, your worth is not 7 by your grades. You're more than a score."

Those words changed my perspective. I had been measuring myself only by numbers. Nurse Wang helped me see that I was 8 of respect and care, no matter what my test results said.

Now I'm not afraid of the school hospital anymore. I even stop by sometimes just to say hello. Nurse Wang taught me that healing isn't only about medicine — it's also about 9 and being seen. In a place that could feel cold and clinical, she created warmth. That's a kind of 10 that no textbook can teach.
