中考英语完形填空：深夜书店的灯光

完形填空原文

There is a bookstore on our street that stays open until midnight. I discovered it by accident one evening when I missed my bus and had to walk home. The warm light from its windows 1 me inside.

The owner, Mr. Zhang, is an elderly man with glasses. "Students are always welcome here," he said. "You can read without buying. Just take care of the books." I couldn't believe it — a place where I could 2 for hours without pressure.

That night, I sat in a corner and read a novel. Around me, a few other people were also reading — a worker in uniform, a woman with a baby, an old man. We were strangers, but we shared something: the quiet 3 of losing ourselves in a good book.

I started visiting the bookstore regularly. It became my escape from the stress of school. When exams made me anxious, I would walk there, pick up a book, and feel my worries 4 away. Mr. Zhang never bothered me. He would sometimes bring me a cup of tea. "Reading," he said, "is one of the few things that can 5 us to different worlds without leaving our seat."

One night, I asked him why he kept the store open so late. "Because some people need a place to go when the world feels too heavy," he replied. "A bookstore at midnight is like a 6 — it welcomes anyone who needs shelter."

His words stayed with me. I had never thought of a bookstore as a refuge. But he was right. In that quiet space, surrounded by books, I felt safe. I felt that I could breathe.

Before the winter holiday, I bought several books from Mr. Zhang. "Thank you for letting me read here," I said. He smiled. "Thank you for 7 my books. A book is meant to be read. When you read, you give it life."

Now I understand. A bookstore is not just a place to buy books. It's a place where stories live, where tired souls can 8, and where a single light can guide someone home on a dark night. Mr. Zhang didn't just sell books — he created a space for people to find 9 and peace. That kind of generosity can't be measured in money. It's a gift that 10 forever.
