中考英语完形填空：废弃车站的涂鸦

完形填空原文

Behind our neighborhood there is an old train station. It has been 1 for ten years — no trains stop there anymore. Most people think it's just an ugly, empty building. But my art teacher, Ms. Chen, saw something different.

One Saturday, she took our class there. "Look at these walls," she said. Over the years, local artists had painted murals on the concrete. There were flowers, animals, and scenes from old stories. "Art can 2 forgotten places," Ms. Chen explained. "It gives them new life."

I had never thought about art that way. I always thought art belonged in museums. But here, in this 3 place, art was everywhere. It was free for anyone to see. No tickets, no rules — just beauty for everyone.

Ms. Chen gave us a task: add something positive to one wall. We could paint whatever we wanted, as long as it brought 4. I was nervous at first. What if I made a mistake? What if people didn't like it?

"Art doesn't have to be perfect," Ms. Chen said. "It just has to be honest. Paint what you 5."

I thought about my grandmother's garden — the sunflowers she grew every summer. I started painting. My hands were shaking, but I kept going. When I finished, I stepped back and looked. It wasn't perfect, but it was 6. It was mine.

Other students painted their memories too — a favorite mountain, a childhood pet, a dream they had. By the end of the day, the gray wall had become a 7 of colors and stories. Strangers who passed by stopped to look. Some smiled. One man said, "This place used to be so sad. Now it feels alive."

That day taught me that we don't need permission to create. We don't need expensive tools or a famous gallery. We just need the 8 to pick up a brush and add something beautiful to the world. Even a forgotten station can become a gallery. Even a blank wall can 9 a story.

Art belongs everywhere — not just in museums, but in the streets, in old buildings, and in the hearts of everyone who dares to 10.
