中考英语完形填空：课间广播的歌声

完形填空原文

Our school plays music during the ten-minute break between classes. Most students don't pay much attention — they're too busy talking, running to the bathroom, or finishing homework. I used to be the same. The music was just background 1, something that filled the empty air.

Then one morning everything changed. I was walking through the hallway, feeling stressed about a math test I had just failed. My head was down. I didn't want to talk to anyone. 2 a familiar song came through the speakers. It was a song my mother used to sing when I was little — a soft, gentle melody that always made me feel safe.

I stopped walking. I stood still in the middle of the busy hallway. For those few minutes, I wasn't thinking about the test or my grades. I was 3 back to my childhood, to rainy afternoons when Mom would sing while I played with my toys. The music wrapped around me like a warm blanket.

When the song ended, I realized I was crying. Not because I was sad, but because I had 4 how much I needed that moment. In our rush to get through each day, we often forget to feel. We forget that a simple song can 5 us to a different place — a memory, a feeling, a person we miss.

From that day on, I started to really listen to the break-time music. Some days it was classical. Some days it was pop. Each song had its own 6. I learned to use those ten minutes as a small gift to myself — a chance to breathe, to pause, to remember that life is more than grades and tests.

I even started a "song of the day" notebook. I wrote down which song played and how it made me feel. My friends thought I was 7. But when one of them had a bad day, I played her a song from my notebook. She sat quietly and listened. "I never knew the break music could actually mean something," she said.

Music is everywhere. We hear it in elevators, in shops, on our phones. But how often do we really 8 it? That morning in the hallway taught me something: the best things in life are often free and right in front of us. We just need to 9 down and notice. A song on the school speakers, a melody from the past — these small things can heal us, remind us, and bring us back to ourselves when we feel 10.
