中考英语完形填空：图书馆的旧书签

完形填空原文

Last Tuesday, I was studying in the school library when a small piece of paper fell out of the book I had just picked up. It was an old bookmark. On it, someone had written a few words in blue ink: "Keep reading. Stories change us." There was no name, only a date from five years ago.

I sat there, holding the bookmark, feeling 1. Who had left it? A student like me? A teacher? I would never know. But those simple words made me think. I had been feeling stressed about the exams. I had almost 2 reading for pleasure. That bookmark seemed to say: "Don't forget why you started."

I decided to keep the bookmark. I put it in my pencil case. Now, whenever I feel too tired to open a book, I look at it. It 3 me that reading is not just for exams. It's for joy, for new ideas, and for the moments when a story touches your heart.

I also started a small habit. When I finish a book that I really 4, I sometimes leave a short note for the next reader. I don't sign my name. I just hope that someday, someone like me will find it and feel the same 5 that I felt when I found that old bookmark.

One day I 6 to pass this bookmark to a younger student. That would be the best lesson I could give.

The library is quiet. Thousands of books stand on the shelves. But that one old bookmark showed me that books connect us — not just with writers, but with each other. We are all 7, sharing stories through time. A bookmark is small. But it can carry a big message: you are not alone in your 8.

I still have that bookmark. The blue ink has faded a little. The paper is soft from age. But the words are still 9. "Keep reading. Stories change us." I believe they will change me, one book at a time. That old bookmark is more than paper — it is a 10 of how stories connect us across the years.
