中考英语完形填空：最后一堂课

完形填空原文

Mr. Zhao had been teaching English at our school for thirty years. When we heard that he was going to 1 at the end of the semester, nobody could believe it. He was the kind of teacher who made even grammar exercises feel fun.

On his last day, Mr. Zhao walked into the classroom as usual. He didn't bring any textbooks. Instead, he brought a small cardboard 2 and placed it on his desk. "Today, I want to share some things with you," he said.

He opened the box and took out a pile of yellow papers — they were old exam papers from his very first year of teaching. "Look at these 3," he said, holding up a test paper. "My first class had thirty-two students. Half of them 4 this test." He laughed. "I was so worried that I was a terrible teacher."

Then he pulled out a photograph of himself as a young man. We could hardly 5 him — he was thin, had long hair, and looked quite shy. "I was just twenty-three then, younger than some of your older brothers and sisters," he said softly. The whole class 6.

Next, he showed us a thick notebook. "This is my teaching diary. I wrote in it every day for the first ten years." He opened a random page and read: "March 12th. Student Xiao Ming finally understood the present perfect tense today. I am 7 than he is." Everyone laughed again.

Mr. Zhao put everything back in the box and looked at us 8. "I kept these things to remind myself why I became a teacher. It was never about being perfect. It was about watching you 9, one step at a time."

The bell rang. Nobody moved. We just sat there, looking at the old man who had given us so much. Then someone in the back row started clapping. Soon, the whole class joined in. Mr. Zhao's eyes were red, but he stood tall and bowed. It was the most 10 class we ever had.
