中考英语完形填空：学做元宵汤圆

完形填空原文

In Chinese culture, eating tangyuan (sweet rice balls) is a tradition that represents family 1. This winter, my mom decided to make tangyuan at home instead of buying them from the store. She invited me to help.

First, we prepared the filling. Mom mixed crushed peanuts, sesame seeds, and sugar together in a bowl. The 2 smelled amazing. Then she scooped small amounts of the mixture and rolled them into tiny balls. I tried to do the same, but my balls were either too big or not 3 enough.

Next came the dough. Mom poured glutinous rice flour into a large bowl and added warm water little by little. She kneaded the flour 4 until it became smooth and soft. "The dough should feel like your earlobe," she said. I touched my ear and laughed. She was right—the texture was very 5.

Then Mom showed me how to wrap the filling. She took a small piece of dough, flattened it in her palm, placed a filling ball in the 6, and carefully closed the edges. She made it look easy, but when I tried, the dough kept breaking and the filling 7 out. After several attempts, I finally made one that held together.

We boiled the tangyuan in a big pot of water. When they 8 to the surface, Mom said they were ready. She served them in sweet ginger soup. I picked one up with a spoon and took a bite. The outside was chewy, and the inside was warm and 9.

As we sat together eating tangyuan, I felt a deep sense of happiness. Making food with family is not just about the result—it is about the 10 you share along the way.
