05-27 第2篇

阅读理解（议论文）

① Should middle school students attend after-school interest classes? This question has caused much debate among parents, teachers and students. Some believe such classes help children develop skills and hobbies, while others worry they add too much pressure.

⑤ In short, after-school interest classes can support growth and happiness when chosen wisely. But students need time to relax and enjoy their childhood too.
