05-31 第2篇

阅读理解（议论文）

① In many schools, teachers share exam rankings with the whole class after each test. Some students feel proud when they see their names at the top, while others feel ashamed when their scores are low. The question is: should exam rankings be made public? People have different opinions about this.

⑤ In my view, there is no perfect answer. The best way may depend on the age of the students, the culture of the school, and the feelings of the families. What matters most is that we help every student grow and feel valued, not only by their exam scores.

注释： self-confidence 自信心；privacy 隐私；creativity 创造力
