06-03 第2篇

阅读理解（记叙文）

① When Mei was twelve, her teacher asked her to join the school calligraphy (书法) competition. Mei had never tried Chinese calligraphy before. She thought it was old-fashioned and boring. "How can writing with a brush be interesting?" she wondered. But she did not want to disappoint her teacher, so she agreed.

② For the first few weeks, Mei found it difficult. Her hands shook when she held the brush. The ink spread (扩散) on the paper and her characters looked messy. She almost gave up. Then, one afternoon, her grandmother came to visit. She saw Mei practising and sat down beside her. "Let me show you," Grandma said softly. She took the brush and wrote the character "永" (yǒng, meaning "forever") with smooth, steady strokes (笔划). Mei watched in surprise. Each stroke had its own beauty — thick or thin, strong or light.

③ "Calligraphy is not just writing," Grandma said. "It is a way to feel peace and connect with our culture. For thousands of years, Chinese people have used it to express their thoughts and feelings." Mei began to understand. She practised every day after that. Slowly, her hands became steadier and her characters became clearer.

④ On the day of the competition, Mei felt nervous. She chose to write a famous poem about spring. As she moved the brush across the paper, she forgot about the judges and the other students. She only focused on each stroke, each character. When she finished, she looked at her work and felt proud. She did not win first place, but she did not mind. Something had changed inside her.

⑤ Now Mei loves calligraphy. She has learned that traditional culture is not boring — it is full of beauty and meaning. She hopes to pass this love to more young people one day.
