06-08 第2篇

阅读理解（议论文）

① In many schools, students have only 10 minutes of break time between classes. Some educators and parents have started to ask: Should students have more time to rest during the school day? This question has caused a lot of discussion.

⑤ In conclusion, there is no simple answer. Both sides have strong reasons. The key is to find a balance — enough rest for health and focus, but not so much that learning time is lost. Schools, parents, and students should work together to find what works best.
