06–10 第2篇

阅读理解（议论文）

① Should schools ban junk food? This question is discussed in many countries. Junk food usually means food with lots of sugar, salt, or fat but little nutrition, such as chips, candy, and sweet drinks. Some people think schools should stop selling it. Others believe students should have the right to choose what they eat.

③ Those who oppose a ban argue that students can still buy junk food outside school. A ban at school does not mean students will eat healthily. Besides, some think it is the parents' job to teach children about food, not the school's. Others say that students should learn to make their own choices. If we ban everything that is not perfect, where do we stop? A little junk food now and then may not cause serious harm.

④ What some schools have done: In some places, schools have removed junk food from canteens and replaced it with salads, sandwiches, and fruit. Reports show that students' health has improved. However, some students miss their favorite snacks and buy them after school instead. There is also the problem that "healthy" food can be more expensive, which may worry some families.

⑤ In conclusion, both sides have valid points. Banning junk food at school may help some students eat better, but it cannot solve the whole problem. Education about healthy eating and support from families are also important. Perhaps the best way is for schools to offer mainly healthy food while still allowing students to understand why some choices are better than others.
