The Invention of Paper and Its Influence on the World

① Paper was first invented in China more than 2,000 years ago. Before paper, people wrote on bamboo (竹子), silk, or animal bones. These materials were either too heavy or too expensive for most people. A man named Cai Lun improved the way to make paper around the year 105 AD. He used tree bark (树皮), old cloth, and other cheap things. His method made paper easier to produce and much cheaper.

③ Papermaking finally spread to other countries through the Silk Road. Around the 8th century, the skill reached the Arab world. From there, it moved to Europe. Before paper arrived, Europeans mainly used animal skin to write on. Paper was much better — it was lighter, cheaper, and easier to use. This helped the growth of schools, libraries, and the spread of science and culture across Europe.

④ Today, paper is used everywhere in the world. We use it for books, newspapers, money, packaging (包装), and many other things. Although we now have computers and the Internet, paper is still important in our daily life. It is hard to imagine a world without paper.

⑤ The invention of paper is one of the greatest gifts China has given to the world. It has helped humans share ideas, preserve (保存) history, and develop culture for over two thousand years. We should remember and be proud of this great invention.
