Finding My Voice Through Colors

① When I was in Grade 7, I thought I was not good at anything. My grades were average. I was too shy to speak in class. I often felt lonely and had no idea how to express my feelings. Then one day, our art teacher, Mr. Chen, handed each student a paintbrush and a piece of paper. "Today, we will paint what we feel," he said. "There are no right or wrong answers. Just be honest."

② At first, I did not know what to draw. I stared at the blank paper for a long time. Then I remembered the sadness I felt when my best friend moved away last month. I picked up a blue brush and began to paint. Dark blue for the sadness. Light blue for the hope that we might meet again. I did not draw any clear shapes—just colors and lines. My hand moved freely across the paper.

③ When I finished, Mr. Chen walked over and looked at my painting. He did not say "good" or "bad." Instead, he said, "I can see you have a lot to say. Your colors tell a story." Those words surprised me. No one had ever said that my feelings mattered. For the first time, I felt that someone understood me.

④ From that day on, I started to paint more often. When I was happy, I used bright colors like yellow and orange. When I was worried, I mixed gray and purple. Painting became my way of saying things I could not put into words. Slowly, I began to feel more confident. I even made friends with classmates who also enjoyed art. We would sit together and share our paintings and our thoughts.

⑤ Now I am in Grade 9. I still paint whenever I need to understand myself better. I have learned that everyone has a unique way to express who they are. For me, it is through colors. For others, it might be through music, writing, or sports. The important thing is to find what works for you and to believe that your voice matters.
