Teaching Grandpa Zhang to Use a Smartphone

① Last summer, our school organized a volunteer activity. We would go to the community centre and help elderly people learn to use smartphones. I joined the activity because I wanted to do something useful. On the first day, I met Grandpa Zhang. He was about seventy years old with kind eyes. He held his new smartphone carefully and said, "My daughter bought this for me. She lives in another city. I want to video call her, but I don't know how." His voice was a little sad.

② I sat down next to him and showed him step by step. "First, open this app. Then find your daughter's name. Look, you tap here to start a video call." Grandpa Zhang watched carefully. He tried to tap the screen, but his finger touched the wrong place. The screen showed something else. He looked worried. "I'm sorry. I'm too old to learn this," he said. I smiled and said, "You're not too old. Let's try again. Everyone makes mistakes at first."

④ In the following weeks, I continued to help Grandpa Zhang and other elderly people. They learned to use maps, read news online, and order food. Every time someone learned something new, they felt proud and happy. I also learned something important: helping others can bring real joy. The elderly people thanked us, but I felt I had received more than I had given.

⑤ That volunteer experience changed my view. Technology can connect people, but sometimes they need someone to show them the way. I am glad I could be that person for Grandpa Zhang and others. A little help can mean a lot to someone who needs it.
