Should Students Be Allowed to Bring Snacks to School?

① In many schools, students are not allowed to bring snacks from home. They can only buy food from the school canteen (食堂) or eat meals provided by the school. However, some parents and students think this rule is too strict. They believe that students should be allowed to bring their own snacks. Is it a good idea? Let us look at both sides of the argument.

② Those who support allowing snacks have their reasons. First, some students have special health needs and may need to eat at a certain time. Second, school canteen food may not suit everyone; snacks give more choices. Third, bringing snacks from home can save money when canteen prices are high. Fourth, parents can pack healthy snacks such as fruit and nuts (坚果).

③ Those who are against it also have strong points. One worry is unhealthy food—chips, candy, and sugary drinks. Eating too much can lead to obesity (肥胖) and tooth problems. Another problem is that wrappers (包装纸) and leftovers can make the classroom messy and attract ants. A third concern is fairness: some students may bring expensive snacks and show off, making others feel bad. Besides, eating in class can distract (使分心) students from their lessons.

⑤ In conclusion, there are both advantages and disadvantages to allowing snacks at school. The key is to find a balance: permit healthy snacks, set clear rules, and help students form good eating habits. A one-size-fits-all (一刀切) rule may not work for everyone.
