A Bargain at the Market

①Last Sunday morning, Li Ming went to the local market with his mother. He was looking at some fruit when he noticed a foreign man standing in front of a seller's stall. The man seemed confused. He pointed at a bag of oranges and asked, "How much?" in slow English. The seller held up ten fingers and said, "Ten yuan!" But the man did not understand and looked worried.

②Li Ming had learned English at school for three years. He walked over and said to the foreigner in English, "These oranges are ten yuan per bag. Would you like to buy them?" The man's face lit up. "Oh, thank you! Can you help me ask if he can lower the price a little? I've heard that bargaining is common here." Li Ming nodded and turned to the seller. "Could you sell it for eight yuan? This gentleman is a visitor from abroad." After a short talk, the seller agreed.

③The foreigner was very happy. He bought the oranges and shook Li Ming's hand. "You're very kind. I'm from Australia. This is my first time in China. Without your help, I wouldn't have known how to communicate." Li Ming smiled. "You're welcome! I'm glad my English could help." The man took out his phone and asked if he could take a photo with Li Ming. Li Ming agreed. They said goodbye and went their separate ways.

④When Li Ming told his mother what had happened, she was proud of him. "You did a good job. Using English to help others is a wonderful thing." Li Ming felt happy. He had always thought English was just for exams. Now he understood—it could really connect people from different countries and make someone's day better.

⑤That small experience at the market made Li Ming more interested in English. He decided to practise speaking it more often. Who knows? Maybe next time he could help another visitor, or even make a new friend from across the world.

注释： stall 摊位；bargain 讨价还价；abroad 在国外；communicate 沟通；connect 连接
