① Should schools publish (公布) exam rankings? In the past, many Chinese schools used to put student rankings on the wall or hand them out to parents. Everyone could see who was first, who was second, and who was last. Now, some schools have stopped doing this. The topic has caused a lot of discussion among teachers, parents, and students.

② Those who support publishing rankings give several reasons. First, it can encourage students to work harder. When students see their rank, they may want to improve and do better next time. Second, it helps parents understand how their child is doing compared with others. They can see if their child needs more help. Third, it is honest and clear. Everyone knows where they stand. Some people also say that ranking is a part of real life — in jobs and exams, we are often compared with others. Students should learn to face it.

③ However, those who oppose publishing rankings have strong arguments. First, it can harm students' self-esteem (自尊). Students who rank low may feel ashamed and lose confidence. They may be laughed at by classmates or scolded by parents. Second, it can create too much pressure. Students may become overly focused on scores and rankings instead of actually learning. Third, ranking does not tell the whole story. A student who improves from 40th to 30th has made real progress, but the ranking still shows 30th. Fourth, some education experts say that comparing students publicly can damage their mental health, especially for teenagers who are still growing.

⑤ There is no perfect answer. The key is to balance honesty about progress with care for students' feelings. Schools and parents should think about what is best for each child. For some students, knowing their rank may push them to do better. For others, it may cause unnecessary stress. Understanding and respect are more important than a single number on a piece of paper.

注释： publish 公布；self-esteem 自尊
