Are Online Games Good or Bad for Teenagers?

① Teenagers spend a lot of time playing online games. Some parents worry that games will harm their children's studies and health. But others think games can be useful. Is playing online games good or bad for teenagers?

⑤ In my view, online games are not all bad, but teenagers should use them wisely. Set a time limit — no more than one hour on school days. Choose games that are educational or encourage teamwork. Never let games take the place of sleep, exercise, or face-to-face time with family and friends. Balance is the key.
