Are After-School Classes Really Necessary?

①Many students today go to after-school classes. They study English, maths, art, or music outside of school. Some parents think these classes help their children get ahead. Others believe they add too much pressure. So, are after-school classes really necessary? Let me share my thoughts.

②On the one hand, after-school classes can be helpful. If a student is weak in a subject, extra practice with a tutor can help them catch up. Some classes offer skills that schools do not teach—like piano or coding. They can open new interests and talents. For students who enjoy learning, these classes can be fun and rewarding.

③On the other hand, too many classes can cause problems. Students need time to rest and play. If every afternoon and weekend is full of classes, when do they relax? When do they spend time with family and friends? I have a classmate who goes to five after-school classes every week. She is always tired. She told me she has no time to read for fun or just lie down. That does not sound healthy.

④I think the key is balance. Not every student needs after-school classes. If you are doing well at school and you have hobbies you enjoy, maybe you do not need more. If you are struggling in one subject, one or two classes might help. But we should not fill every hour with study. Free time is important too. It helps us grow in other ways—creativity, social skills, and mental health.

⑤Parents and students should talk together. What does the child really need? What do they enjoy? Every child is different. There is no single "right" answer. The best choice is the one that fits the child, not the one that fits the neighbour's child.
