完形填空原文

Last weekend, my grandmother taught me how to make soybean milk at home. She said homemade soy milk was healthier and 1 than the one from shops. I was curious and wanted to learn.

First, we needed to soak the soybeans in water. Grandma said we should leave them for at least six hours, or 2 overnight. The beans would become soft and easier to break. In the morning, the beans had grown bigger. I poured out the water and rinsed them 3.

Next, we put the beans and some fresh water into a blender. We turned it on and let it run for about two minutes. The beans were broken into a white liquid. Grandma said we could add a little sugar if we liked it 4, but she preferred the original taste. I added just a little.

Then came the important step: we had to 5 the liquid. We used a piece of cloth to separate the soy milk from the bean residue. I poured the mixture slowly and squeezed the cloth gently. The smooth milk ran through, and the thick residue stayed in the cloth. We could use the residue to make other 6 if we wanted.

Finally, we boiled the soy milk in a pot. Grandma warned that we must boil it thoroughly, or it might not be safe to 7. We stirred it from time to time to avoid burning. When it was ready, the whole kitchen smelled 8. I poured a cup for myself. It was warm and tasty. Making soy milk was not difficult at all. I think I will make it again. Maybe I can try adding different flavors next time, such as red dates or peanuts. It's 9 to learn these life skills from our elders. They have so much 10 to pass on to us.
