中考英语完形填空：学做窗花

完形填空原文

Window flowers, or chuanghua, are a type of traditional Chinese paper cutting used to decorate windows during festivals. Last Saturday, my grandmother taught me how to make them. She said that when she was young, every family in the village would put up window flowers to 1 the New Year.

Grandmother prepared thin red paper, a pair of small sharp scissors, and a pencil. She said red paper is used because red is a lucky 2 in Chinese culture. It represents happiness and good fortune.

First, she folded a piece of red paper several times into a small triangle. Then she drew a simple pattern on it with a pencil. The pattern had flowers, leaves, and a little bird. I watched her hands move 3 and steadily—she had been doing this for over fifty years.

Then Grandmother picked up the scissors and began to cut. Her cuts were smooth and 4. Within minutes, she unfolded the paper and a beautiful symmetrical design appeared. I clapped my hands in amazement. It looked like 5!

Now it was my turn. Grandmother drew a simpler pattern for me—just a basic flower shape. I folded the paper and tried to cut along the lines. But my hands were not 6 enough, and I accidentally cut off one of the petals. I felt disappointed.

Grandmother smiled and said, "Don't worry. Even I used to make 7 when I was learning. The key is to practice more." She gave me another piece of paper, and I tried again. This time, I cut more slowly and carefully. When I unfolded it, the flower was not perfect, but it was much 8 than my first try.

We spent the whole afternoon making window flowers. By the end, I had made five pieces that I was 9 of. We put them on the windows, and they looked beautiful with the sunlight shining through.

Grandmother said, "Window flowers carry our wishes for a happy life. Every cut tells a 10." I realized that this simple art form holds deep meaning and I want to keep learning.
