中考英语完形填空：修自行车的爷爷

完形填空原文

For as long as anyone could remember, an old man named Grandpa Wang had set up his small bicycle repair stand at the corner of our street. He was a quiet man with kind eyes and hands covered in dark oil 1. Every day from morning to evening, he fixed flat tires, adjusted brakes, and tightened loose chains.

My friends and I 2 rode our bikes past his stand on our way to school. We never paid much attention to him. He was just part of the street, like the old tree or the mailbox. But one day, my bike chain broke right in front of him. I 3 off and felt anxious because I had no money with me.

Grandpa Wang saw me and smiled. "Bring it here, young man," he said. I hesitated, but he 4 my bike gently and started working on it. Within five minutes, the chain was fixed. I touched my empty pockets and felt 5. "I'm sorry, Grandpa Wang. I don't have any money to pay you today," I mumbled.

He laughed a warm, deep laugh. "Don't worry about it," he said, wiping his hands on a rag. "Just do well in school. That's enough 6 for an old man like me."

I thanked him and rode away, feeling deeply moved. A few weeks later, the neighborhood committee announced that they were going to clear the street corner, which meant Grandpa Wang had to 7. When people heard this, something amazing happened. Neighbors started pouring in with their bikes — even ones that didn't need 8. Some brought him hot tea, others brought homemade food.

We all suddenly realized how much we had taken his quiet presence for 9. He wasn't just a repairman; he was the unspoken guardian of our neighborhood's daily trips. On his last day, I went to say goodbye and gave him a drawing of his stand. He looked at it for a long time, his eyes 10 with tears. "This," he said softly, "is the best payment I could ever receive."
