中考英语完形填空：第一次当主持人

完形填空原文

Our school English Festival was two weeks away. Each class had to prepare a short play. Our teacher Ms. Wang asked for a volunteer to be the host. Nobody raised their hand. Hosting meant speaking in front of the whole school — more than six hundred students and teachers. The idea made my heart 1.

I had never been good at speaking in public. Last year, I had to give a one-minute speech in class. My hands shook and I forgot half of my 2. I did not want to repeat that experience.

But that night, I couldn't sleep. I kept thinking about the host position. What if I 3? What if this was my chance to improve?

The next morning, I went to Ms. Wang's office. "I'd like to try being the host," I said. My voice was so quiet that she asked me to 4 myself.

She smiled. "I'm glad you volunteered. Let's start practicing tomorrow."

For the next two weeks, I practiced every day. I read the script aloud in my room, in front of a mirror, and then in the empty classroom. Ms. Wang gave me tips: speak slowly, look at the audience, and 5 when I made a small mistake. "Nobody is perfect," she said. "The audience wants you to succeed."

The night before the festival, I was too nervous to eat. My father sat down with me and said, "Remember when you first learned to ride a bike? You fell many times. But you never gave up. Tomorrow is just another 6 to try."

His words helped. The next afternoon, I stood on the stage. The lights were bright. I could see hundreds of faces. I took a deep breath and began to speak.

My voice was steady. I introduced each class's performance one by one. When I 7 a word, I paused, smiled, and went on. The audience didn't laugh at me. They listened.

When the festival ended, several students came up to me. "You did great!" one of them said. Another said, "I could never do that. You were so 8."

I wasn't brave at the start. I was scared. But I learned something 9: courage doesn't mean you have no fear. It means you do the right thing even when you're 10. That afternoon on the stage, I took a small step. But for me, it was a big one.
