中考英语完形填空：收音机的声音

完形填空原文

My grandfather's radio was old and worn. The buttons were loose, and the sound sometimes came out fuzzy. But Grandpa would never 1 it. He had bought it forty years ago with his first month's salary. To him, it was more than a machine — it was a 2 of his youth.

Every evening after dinner, Grandpa would sit in his armchair, turn on the radio, and listen to the news or music. I used to think it was 3. "Why not use your phone or watch TV?" I asked him once.

He smiled and said, "When I was young, the radio was our only window to the world. I listened to it with my whole family. Those were happy 4."

One day, the radio stopped working. Grandpa tried to fix it, but he couldn't. He looked so sad. I had never seen him like that before.

I decided to 5 him. I went online and searched for someone who could repair old radios. After a few days, I found an old repairman in the next town. I took the radio to him.

"It's a classic," the repairman said. "I'll do my best." A week later, he called. The radio was ready.

I brought it home and gave it to Grandpa. When he turned it on and heard the familiar 6, his eyes lit up. "You fixed it! Thank you, my dear."

From that day on, I started to understand. The radio was not just about sound. It was about 7 — memories of the past, and a connection between Grandpa and his family. Sometimes we hold on to old things not because they are useful, but because they 8 something important to us.

Now I sometimes sit with Grandpa and listen to the radio too. We don't talk much, but we share the same moment. In a world full of screens and noise, that simple 9 feels strangely peaceful.

Grandpa says the best gift I ever gave him was not the repaired radio, but the 10 that I finally understood why it mattered.
