中考英语完形填空：被退回的作文

完形填空原文

In seventh grade, I dreamed of becoming a writer. I spent every free moment scribbling stories in a notebook. My characters went on adventures, solved mysteries, and 1 dragons. Writing made me feel alive.

One day, our English teacher, Ms. Chen, gave us a homework assignment: write a short story about something 2. I was thrilled. This was my chance to show everyone what I could do.

I stayed up until midnight working on my story. It was about a boy who discovered a hidden door behind his school library. I thought it was the 3 thing I had ever written.

The next week, Ms. Chen returned our papers. When she handed me mine, I saw a large red "C" at the top. My heart 4. Below the grade, she had written: "Good imagination, but the writing needs more work. See me after class."

I wanted to throw the paper away. A "C" was not what I had 5. I felt embarrassed and angry. Some classmates got A's, and their stories weren't even half as creative as mine.

After class, Ms. Chen sat down with me. "I can see you have talent," she said. "But talent alone is not 6. You need to learn structure, grammar, and how to revise. A diamond needs polishing before it can 7."

She gave me a book on creative writing and asked me to rewrite the story. At first, I didn't want to. But 8, I opened the book and started reading. It taught me things I had never thought about — how to build tension, how to develop characters, how to choose the right words.

I rewrote the story three times. Each version was 9 than the last. When I finally turned it in, Ms. Chen read it and smiled. "Now THIS is writing," she said.

That experience taught me an important lesson: being told you're not good enough is not the end. It's the 10. The people who push you to improve are the ones who truly believe in you.
