中考英语完形填空：失声的歌手

完形填空原文

Lin Yue had the best voice in our school. When she sang, everyone stopped to 1. Teachers said she had a gift. Students said she would be famous one day.

Then, one cold morning in November, Lin Yue woke up and couldn't speak. Her voice was completely 2. The doctor said she had damaged her vocal cords and needed to rest them for at least three months. No singing, no shouting — not even whispering.

For Lin Yue, this was like losing a part of herself. She had been chosen to sing at the school's New Year concert, the biggest 3 of the year. Now she had to give it up.

At first, she refused to come to school. She stayed in her room and 4 for days. Her mother told my mother that Lin Yue had stopped eating properly and barely slept.

Our class decided to do something. We made a large card with messages from every student. Some wrote jokes. Some drew pictures. I wrote: "Your voice is resting, not gone. It will come back 5 than ever."

When we brought the card to her house, Lin Yue opened the door with red eyes. She read every 6 carefully, and slowly, a small smile appeared on her face.

After that, Lin Yue returned to school. She couldn't talk, so she communicated by writing notes on a small whiteboard. At first, it was 7 for her. But soon, classmates started writing notes back to her, and it became a special way of chatting.

During those three months, Lin Yue discovered something 8. She began writing song lyrics. Without her voice, she turned to words on paper. She wrote about friendship, about silence, about waiting. Her lyrics were so beautiful that our music teacher used one of them in the concert.

When spring came, Lin Yue's voice 9. On the first day she could sing again, she performed her own song in front of the whole school. There was not a dry eye in the audience.

"Sometimes," she said into the microphone, "you have to 10 something to discover what really matters."
