中考英语完形填空：许愿瓶

完形填空原文

On the last day of primary school, our teacher gave each of us a small glass bottle. "Write down your biggest wish on a piece of paper," she said, "and put it inside. Open it when you 1 from middle school."

I remember thinking hard about what to write. Some classmates wished for good grades. Others wished for new phones or video games. I wrote: "I wish to have a 2 friend who stays with me forever."

I sealed the bottle and put it on my bookshelf. Over the years, it collected dust. I almost 3 about it — until last week, when I was packing for high school.

There it was, hidden behind a row of books. I picked it up and held it to the light. The tiny piece of paper was still inside, 4 tightly.

I opened the bottle and read my wish. "A true friend who stays with me forever." I smiled, because I knew that wish had already come 5.

Her name is Zhang Mei. We met on the first day of seventh grade. She sat next to me and offered me half of her sandwich because I had forgotten my 6. That small act of kindness started a friendship that lasted three years.

We weren't always the same. She loved math; I loved English. She was loud and 7; I was quiet and shy. But somehow, we fit perfectly together, like two pieces of a puzzle.

We had our share of disagreements too. Once, we didn't speak to each other for a whole week because of a 8 misunderstanding. I don't even remember what it was about now. But Zhang Mei was the first to apologize. She left a note on my desk: "I'm sorry. Our friendship is more 9 than being right."

Standing in my room with the wish bottle in my hand, I took out my phone and called her. "Zhang Mei," I said, "I need to tell you something. Six years ago, I made a wish. And you made it come true."

There was a long silence. Then I heard her laugh — and 10. "You're making me cry, you fool," she said. And we both laughed.
