中考英语完形填空：校园跳蚤市场

完形填空原文

Every June, our school holds a flea market. Students can sell old books, toys, clothes, and anything else they no longer 1. The money raised goes to a local charity.

This year, I decided to sell some of my old things. I gathered a box of picture books, a few board games, and a pair of roller skates I had outgrown. My mother also added a set of cooking pots she never used.

On the day of the market, each class set up a table in the playground. The 2 was lively and colorful. Some students made posters. Others shouted prices like real shopkeepers. It felt more like a festival than a school event.

At first, business was 3. People walked by our table without stopping. I started to feel discouraged. Then Li Na, my teammate, had an idea. "Let's offer a special deal," she said. "Buy two items and get one 4."

The deal worked like magic. Within an hour, we had sold most of our books and all of the board games. A first-grader bought my roller skates and immediately put them on, skating 5 around the playground with a huge grin on his face.

But the cooking pots were a harder sell. Nobody seemed 6 in them. Then an old woman walked by. She stopped, picked up a pot, and examined it carefully. "How much?" she asked.

"Twenty yuan," I said.

She shook her head. "Too much for an old woman like me." She started to walk away.

I looked at the pots. My mother hadn't used them in years. They were just taking up 7 at home. "Wait," I called out. "You can have them for five yuan."

Her face broke into a wide smile. "You're a 8 child," she said, handing me a five-yuan note.

By the end of the day, our class had raised over 800 yuan. We were the 9 earners in the whole school. But the best part wasn't the money. It was seeing the joy on people's faces when they found something they loved at a price they could afford.

I went home that evening with an empty box and a full 10. Sometimes, letting go of old things makes room for something better — like the warm feeling of helping others.
