中考英语完形填空：一张旧地图

完形填空原文

While cleaning the attic last weekend, I found a dusty old box behind the bookshelf. Inside was a hand-drawn map on yellowed paper. It showed our neighborhood, but everything looked 1 — the streets were narrower, there were no tall buildings, and a river ran through the middle of what is now Main Street.

"Grandpa, what's this?" I asked, bringing the map downstairs.

His eyes widened when he saw it. "I drew that when I was your age," he said, his voice filled with 2. "That's what this neighborhood looked like sixty years ago."

I was fascinated. "There was a river here?"

"Yes," he said, sitting down slowly. "We used to swim in it during summer. There were fish, frogs, and even turtles. The water was so 3 you could drink it."

I couldn't believe it. The same spot was now a busy road covered in concrete. "What happened to the river?" I asked.

"They filled it in when I was about twenty," Grandpa explained. "The city was growing, and they needed more 4 for roads and buildings. People thought it was progress."

He pointed to another spot on the map. "Here was a forest where we played every afternoon. And here was old Mr. Huang's farm — he grew the best watermelons in town." He 5 at the memory.

"Do you miss it?" I asked.

He was 6 for a moment. "Every day," he said quietly. "But you can't stop time. Things change. The important thing is to 7 what we have now and to learn from the past."

That conversation inspired me. For my geography project, I decided to compare Grandpa's map with a 8 one. I interviewed elderly neighbors, collected old photos, and created a before-and-after display.

My teacher loved it. She said it was the most meaningful project she had ever 9. "History isn't just in books," she told the class. "It's in our neighborhoods, our families, and even in our attics."

I hung Grandpa's map on my bedroom wall. Every time I look at it, I'm 10 that the places we love today will also change someday. And that makes me want to appreciate them even more.
