中考英语完形填空：琴房里的新手指

完形填空原文

I started learning piano when I was twelve. Most of my classmates had begun years earlier. When I walked into the practice room for the first time, I could hear beautiful music from the next room. The girl there was playing a piece I had only heard on the radio. I felt so 1 that I almost wanted to quit before I began.

My teacher, Mr. Chen, noticed my expression. "Don't compare yourself to others," he said. "Everyone has their own 2. You're here to write yours, not to copy someone else's."

His words comforted me a little. But the first weeks were still difficult. My fingers were stiff. I often hit the wrong keys. The simple tunes I played sounded nothing like the music I had 3. I practiced for an hour every day after school. Sometimes my fingertips hurt. I wondered if I would ever get better.

One afternoon, I was practicing a scale when I heard a knock on the door. It was the girl from the next room — the one who played so well. "I used to sound like that too," she said with a smile. "When I first started, I 4 my teacher would ask me to leave. But he never did. He said every expert was once a beginner."

Her words gave me 5. I kept practicing. Month after month, my fingers became more flexible. The wrong notes became fewer. One day, I finally played a complete piece without mistakes. I was so 6 that I ran to tell Mr. Chen. He smiled and said, "See? I told you. Your story is different from everyone else's — but it's yours."

The girl and I became friends. We sometimes practiced together. She taught me how to listen to the music inside me, not just the notes on the page. "Music is not about being 7," she said. "It's about expressing what you feel."

Now I'm in my third year of piano. I'm not the best in our school, but I'm proud of how far I've come. I still remember those 8 days when every note seemed impossible. They taught me that the best growth happens when we refuse to 9. Every expert was once a beginner — and every beginner can become an expert, as long as they keep playing their own 10, one note at a time.
