中考英语完形填空：爷爷的木工房

完形填空原文

My grandfather had a small workshop behind our house. It was full of wooden tools, sawdust, and the smell of fresh wood. When I was little, I was not allowed to go in — Grandpa said the tools were too 1 for a child. But I always stood at the door and watched him work.

As I grew older, Grandpa started teaching me. "Woodworking is not just about making things," he said. "It's about patience. You can't 2 a good piece. You have to wait for it."

I learned slowly. At first I only sanded wood — running my hand over the surface again and again until it felt smooth. It was boring, but Grandpa never hurried me. "Every master was once a 3," he would say.

When I was thirteen, Grandpa let me make my first real project: a small wooden box. I measured, sawed, and sanded for two weeks. When I finished, the corners weren't perfect. I felt 4. "Grandpa, it's not good enough."

He picked up the box and turned it over in his hands. "It's your first work. It's supposed to have marks. Those marks tell a story — your story. Perfection comes with time. What matters now is that you 5."

Years later, Grandpa's hands became unsteady. He could no longer hold the saw. But he still sat in the workshop every afternoon, 6 me while I worked. "Your turns are getting smoother," he would say. "You're learning."

I understood then. The workshop was never just about wood. It was about 7 — Grandfather and grandson, one generation passing knowledge to the next. The tools, the smell, the patient hours — they were all part of a language that didn't need words.

When Grandpa passed away last year, I inherited his workshop. I keep his old tools on the wall. Sometimes when I'm sanding a piece of wood, I still hear his 8: "Take your time. A good piece can't be rushed."

That wooden box I made at thirteen still sits on my desk. Its imperfect corners remind me that growth is a 9, not a finish line. And every time I walk into the workshop, I feel Grandpa's presence. He's not gone — he lives on in every cut, every sand, every lesson about patience and 10 that he left behind.
