中考英语完形填空：军训体验

完形填空原文

Every September, our school holds a week-long military training for new students. This year, it was my turn. I had heard many stories about it — some said it was 1, while others said it was a valuable experience. I decided to keep an open mind.

On the first morning, we gathered on the playground at six o'clock. Our instructor was a young soldier named Captain Zhang. He stood straight like a tree and spoke in a loud, clear 2. "From today, you are no longer ordinary students. You are soldiers," he said. We all stood a little taller after hearing his words.

The training began with basic moves: standing at attention, turning left and right, and marching. These seemed simple, but doing them 3 for a long time was exhausting. The sun was burning hot, and sweat ran down our faces. Some students felt dizzy and had to sit down. I wanted to give up too, but I looked around and saw my classmates still 4. I told myself to hold on.

The afternoons were slightly easier. We learned to fold our quilts into neat squares, which the soldiers called "tofu blocks." My first attempt looked more like a 5 than a block. But after practising many times, I finally got it right. Captain Zhang nodded with approval, and I felt a sense of achievement.

The most memorable part was the night march on the fourth day. We walked five kilometres in the dark with only the stars above us. Nobody spoke. The only 6 was our footsteps on the ground. I felt tired, but also strangely peaceful. Walking together in silence created a strong 7 among us.

By the end of the week, we were different people. We could stand perfectly still for thirty minutes. We could march in perfect formation. More importantly, we had learned the value of 8. When one person made a mistake, the whole team had to start over. We learned to support and encourage each other.

At the closing ceremony, Captain Zhang gave a short speech. "You have all done well," he said. "Remember what you learned here: when things get tough, don't 9." Many students, including me, had tears in our eyes.

Military training was one of the most 10 experiences of my school life. It taught me discipline, teamwork and perseverance. I will carry these lessons with me forever.
