03-28 第2篇

The Race I'll Never Forget

① Last October, our school held its annual Sports Day. I had never been good at sports, so I usually just watched from the side. But this year, my PE teacher, Mr. Wang, asked me to run in the 400-meter race. "Give it a try, Li Wei," he said. "You might surprise yourself." I wanted to say no, but something in his voice made me agree.

② For two weeks before Sports Day, I practiced running every afternoon. At first, I could hardly finish one lap around the track without stopping. My legs hurt and I was always out of breath. But Mr. Wang ran beside me every day and taught me how to control my speed. "Don't start too fast," he said. "Save your energy for the last 100 meters." Slowly, my time began to improve.

③ The big day finally came. When I stood at the starting line, my heart was beating so fast that I could hear it in my ears. There were seven other runners, and most of them looked much stronger than me. The whistle blew, and we all rushed forward. I remembered Mr. Wang's advice and kept a steady pace while others sprinted ahead.

④ By the halfway point, I was in sixth place. I felt tired, but I kept going. As we entered the last 100 meters, I still had energy left. I pushed my legs harder and harder. One runner... two runners... I passed them one by one. The crowd was cheering loudly. I crossed the finish line in third place! I couldn't believe it. I had won a bronze medal.

⑤ That evening, I held the medal in my hand and thought about what I had learned. It wasn't really about winning or losing. It was about having the courage to try something difficult and not giving up. Mr. Wang's words came back to me: "You might surprise yourself." He was right. Sometimes we are stronger than we think.
