05-21 第2篇

阅读理解（议论文）

① Should students be allowed to use mobile phones in class? This question has caused heated debate (争论) among teachers, parents and students. Some people argue that phones can be useful learning tools, while others believe they do more harm than good in the classroom. Let us look at both sides of the argument.

⑤ In my opinion, the best approach is to have clear rules. Phones should be turned off and kept in bags during lessons. Students can use them only during breaks or for special projects when the teacher allows. This way, we keep the classroom focused while still making use of technology when it truly helps. Balance is the key — we should embrace technology, but not at the cost of concentration and good learning habits.
