05-23 第2篇

阅读理解（议论文）

① Should teenagers have pocket money? This question causes a lot of discussion in many families. Some parents think teenagers are too young to manage money, so they buy everything for their children. However, I believe that giving teenagers a proper amount of pocket money is important for their growth, especially for developing financial literacy (理财能力).

⑤ In conclusion, pocket money is a useful tool for teaching teenagers about money. It is not just about buying things — it is about learning to plan, save, and make smart decisions. When teenagers learn these skills early, they will be better prepared for their future life.

注释： literacy 能力；salary 薪水；responsibility 责任
