05-24 第2篇

阅读理解（记叙文）

① Zhang Wei was a quiet boy who loved science. He spent most of his free time reading science books and doing small experiments in his room. His parents thought he was a dreamer. "Why don't you go out and play with other children?" his mother often asked. But Zhang Wei preferred to stay indoors and explore how things worked.

④ When the results were announced, Zhang Wei could not believe his ears. He had won the first prize! His parents, who had come to watch, hugged him with tears in their eyes. "We are so proud of you," his father said. Zhang Wei's classmates cheered and crowded around him to congratulate him. For the first time, he felt that his "dreaming" had led to something real.
