05-29 第2篇

阅读理解（议论文）

① Many parents and teachers are worried about teenagers spending too much time in front of screens — phones, computers, tablets and TVs. Should young people reduce their screen time? This question has led to a lot of discussion.

② Those who support reducing screen time believe it brings several benefits. First, too much screen use can harm eyesight. Second, sitting for a long time may lead to health problems such as back pain or being overweight. Third, spending hours on social media (社交媒体) can make some teenagers feel unhappy or anxious when they compare themselves with others. Last, cutting down on screen time leaves more time for outdoor activities, exercise, reading and face-to-face communication with family and friends.

④ In my view, both sides have reasonable points. Screen time itself is neither good nor bad. What matters is how we use it. We should balance study, rest and entertainment. It is a good idea to take regular breaks when using screens, avoid using them before bed, and make sure we have enough time for exercise and real-world activities. Parents and schools can help by teaching young people healthy habits.

⑤ In the end, the goal is not to get rid of screens, but to use them in a way that supports our health and well-being.
