Summer Days at Grandma's Village

① When I was ten years old, my parents sent me to spend the summer with Grandma in her small village. I felt a little sad at first because I would miss my friends in the city. But Grandma's warm smile at the train station made me feel better. Her house stood beside a green field. A small river ran behind the garden. Everything looked fresh and quiet.

② Every morning, Grandma woke me up early. "The best time to enjoy the village is in the morning," she said. We would walk to the vegetable garden together. Grandma grew tomatoes, cucumbers, and corn. I helped her water the plants and pick the ripe vegetables. She taught me the names of different birds that sang in the trees. I had never noticed such things in the city.

④ In the evenings, Grandma and I sat outside under the stars. She told me stories about her childhood and how the village had changed over the years. I listened and laughed. The stars seemed brighter there than in the city. I felt peaceful and happy. Those nights became my favorite memories.

⑤ Now I am grown up, but I still think about that summer often. Grandma is no longer with us, but her love and those warm village days stay in my heart. Sometimes when life gets busy and noisy, I close my eyes and remember the green fields, the river, and Grandma's smile. Those simple, happy days were the best gift she ever gave me.
