07-09 第2篇

阅读理解（记叙文）

① Last Spring Festival, my cousin Lin Tao decided to try something new. Instead of just spending his holiday playing games at home, he wanted to earn some money by himself. With his parents' permission, he set up a small stall (摊位) at the local festival market, selling handmade paper lanterns.

③ The market opened on the first day of the new year. For the first hour, few people stopped at his stall. Lin Tao began to worry. Then an elderly woman came and asked about his lanterns. She bought three and said they would make lovely gifts for her grandchildren. Her kind words encouraged Lin Tao. Soon, more customers came. Some bought lanterns for their homes; others bought them as festival gifts.

⑤ Lin Tao used part of the money to buy a gift for his grandmother and saved the rest for his school supplies. He said the experience was more valuable than the money itself. This year, he plans to return to the market with new ideas for his stall.
