① Do After-School Interest Classes Take Away Children's Rest Time?

② In recent years, more and more parents send their children to after-school interest classes (课外兴趣班)—music, art, sports, and so on. But a question often comes up: do these classes take away children's rest time and harm their health? People have different views on this.

⑤ The conclusion: There is no simple yes or no answer. The key is balance. Children need both time to learn new skills and time to rest. Parents should listen to their children and not arrange (安排) too many classes. One or two interest classes a week may be fine, but filling every afternoon with classes is not a good idea. Rest and sleep are important for growing children—we should never forget that.
